Much social science research has important policy implications. More than 60 percent of NSF-funded social science studies, for example, claim their research will be of use in the policy process. Yet many researchers have relatively simplistic views of how research findings reach the policy process and how the findings get used. A major purpose of this workshop is discuss how to write a policy brief, but we will put this method for bringing research work into the policy process in a broader context, suggesting when a variety of other formats (e.g., amicus briefs, testimony, informal meetings) might also be effective. We will provide examples of policy-oriented research documents, and examine effective presentation formats. We will discuss different ways research is used in the policy process depending on the audiences and the purposes, elaborating on how communications strategies, personal/professional relationships, networks, and policy-oriented activities and strategies effect the utilization of research. Workshop participants will be asked to think about what research is amenable to policy writing, who the policy audiences might be for such research, what formats might best capture the attention of diverse audiences, what impact can be expected and who, as social scientists, they can develop relationships to facilitate getting their research into the policy process. Finally, we will collectively think about how sociology associations can promote the legitimacy of this work as professional work.
